CHINA-TAIWAN: Releasing Nationalist Prisoners

China's announced plans to release over 4,000 former Kuomintang officials—some of whom have been in captivity for over 30 years—aim in part to demonstrate its peaceful stance toward Taiwan. Beijing had already released several hundred senior Kuomintang prisoners in 1975; the remaining captives are lower ranking civil and military officials. Taiwan, fearing that China would use former prisoners as political infiltrators, only last year allowed the first member of the group freed in 1975 to come to the island.

Comment: The Chinese move will embarrass Taiwan, which still insists that the civil war continues and that China represents a military threat to the island. Taiwan wants to avoid any international incidents—such as the suicide of a former Kuomintang general who was refused entry in 1975—and is likely to allow some prisoners to visit relatives on the island, while quietly interning others.
